I think there is one important skill that future doctors should have in order to communicate effectively with patients from diverse backgrounds. It is the ability to listen to what patients have to say till the end and understand it. Patients from different cultures may take longer time to convey what they want to say than the locals. Therefore, doctors should wait for patients to finish talking, and based on their request give proper medical treatment. This skill will build trust between doctors and patients and help relieve patients' anxiety, which will benefit both of them.
